Introduction

February 11, 2025

Dear friend, on these pages I am sharing musings on reality and human nature, poems and research notes about yoga therapy, natural hygiene and everything that is helping me regain health and sanity in a profoundly sick world. Some of the material herein is in its raw form still as I don't always feel inspired to put "my" thoughts into a cohesive text but deem them valuable sharing nevertheless. I hope that it will be of benefit to you and relieve some suffering. Always remember: Every drop flows into the ocean, nothing can prevent you from eventually returning home. In the meanwhile, I wish you a smooth ride through the samsaric fun park.

By the way, nowhere on this site am I committing to the folly of claiming truth about anything. The paradigms I am using are one of innumerable lenses on What-is, they are as true and false as all others. Whether it comes to the nature of reality or the domain of health and healing, paradigms have no absolute value, it is bound to time and space. What makes a valid paradigm for me is its usefulness, simplicity and beauty alone. Once it no longer serves me and the moment demands a different response, I discard it. Staying attached to one way of seeing creates blindness. The river of life is ever changing and what was helpful yesterday might be of no use today. So always be flexible and have an array of different lenses at hand.

Robotic Existence

February 12, 2025

Suffering is never caused by experience but our interpretation of it based on the arbitrary reality-filter of our value system. Experience might be painful but pain in itself is a neutral event and turns into suffering only when we react to it with aversion. It is the storehouse of our past impressions that determines our reaction to experience. The ego's agenda to control and manipulate experience separates us from immediacy with it and makes it something that is wrong thereby causing the fruitless endeavor to escape it through neurotic and addictive behavior. Out of this evaluation of experience arise reactive patterns which create further suffering and increase the stranglehold of our conditioning. As long as we split experience into desired and rejected aspects we are bound to the wheel of suffering.

Only that traumatic experience which is not properly processed and discharged leaves a psychic scar and hook for future re-activation. PTSD is a dysfunctional reactive tendency of avoidance and denial towards the triggers of unprocessed psychic scars. Over time these conditioned protective mechanisms form a rigid character structure which blocks the free and spontaneous expression of our essence. We then identify with our programming, our pretense and the masks that we present to the world and resist everything that challenges them. By following the same neural pathways day by day we keep repeating the past and its pain. Sleepwalking through life we don't see the present for what it is and burden our surroundings with the projections and re-enactment of our childhood dramas. In order to see clearly we have to embrace and tend to our psychic scars and clear the perceptual filters. When painful experiences are properly processed they lead to wisdom and don't leave any hooks for future activation of the same pain. Cleaning the lens through which we look at the world is our divine duty and true spiritual activism.

The process of yoga is a continuous liberation from all latent impressions, reactive tendencies, patterned behaviors, false identities and cultural filters and biases. It is about embracing and valuing raw experience without the ego's agenda of control and manipulation and opening ourselves up to What-is. Only when we leave all our preferences and stories about our experience behind and stop trying to escape it through neurotic and compulsive behavior can we be healed by the presence of our shared being which knows no suffering and is the source of the happiness that we have been seeking in the wrong places for all of our lives.

Biological Imperatives

February 13, 2025

Modern civilization has burdened and compromised our biology to such an extent that dysfunction and disease have become the norm. The average person exists in a state of normalized imbalance, mistaking it for health. For eons, we lived without electromagnetic radiation, toxic chemicals, pharmaceuticals, vaccinations, processed foods, pollutants, artificial light, and the relentless overstimulation of technology. Only recently have we constructed an environment that sickens not just our bodies but also our souls - severing our connection to the wellspring of happiness, health, and the nourishing roots of life itself.

What we commonly call "health" is, in truth, a latent state of disease, a collective illusion shaped by a civilization that has accepted degeneration as inevitable. Humanity has normalized the slow deterioration of the bodymind, the progressive loss of vitality, and an undignified aging process that ends in chronic illness and an unconscious death - believing it to be Nature's way. But how far from truth! Vitality does not fade simply because we age, but because of the toxic inner environment festering within us. When the body can no longer compensate and obstructions accumulate beyond its capacity to cleanse itself, chronic disease emerges.

Yet vibrant health is our birthright, not a distant dream but our natural state before we became shackle by the grinding mill of modern life. To restore it, we must remember a forgotten way and resist the forces of civilization that tempt us to violate the laws of Nature. Healing does not require adding anything external, no treatments and not medicines, only the removal of blockages that impede the free flow of life force within us. With patience and discipline, we can reverse the effects of toxic living, dissolve chronic ailments, and even heal genetic weaknesses, allowing Nature to restore us on its non-invasive operating table.

The first and most crucial step is to honor our biological imperatives, providing the body with its proper inner and outer milieu. When we do so, healing unfolds spontaneously, deep homeostasis is restored, and evolution becomes possible.

To activate the body's innate self-healing abilities, we must align with the following biological necessities:

- Hydration – Drink spring water or use a high-quality filter.
- Alkaline, mineral-rich food – Nourish the body with whole, natural foods, preferably raw.
- Fresh air – Prioritize outdoor exposure and proper ventilation.
- Earthing – Walk barefoot for at least an hour daily or lie nakedly on the ground.
- Movement – Engage in regular exercise to keep the lymphatic system flowing.
- Rest – Allow the body time free from stimulation and activity.
- Freedom from toxins – Avoid additives in food, pesticides, medications and vaccines.

- Sun exposure – Sunbathe and practice sun gazing.
- Electromagnetic hygiene – Reduce radiation exposure and use technology consciously.
- Natural light – Align daily rhythms with sunlight to regulate hormones.
- Sleep hygiene – Maintain a natural and regular circadian rhythm for optimal pineal gland function; sleep in complete darkness to support melatonin production.
- Natural clothing – Wear fabrics free from synthetic materials.

By aligning with these principles, we move beyond survival and reclaim the radiant health that was always meant to be ours. The body does not seek disease - it seeks balance. When we remove the obstacles to healing it happens naturally and effortlessly.

In the Ocean of Life

February 14, 2025

When nights are weeping, I swim
in an ocean of tears with countless beings.
When days are blooming, I dance hand in hand with all existence.
The boundary of skin separates us in thought alone.

Riding the Wave

February 15, 2025

When we introduce too much yoga practice suddenly or make drastic life changes over night the ego feels threatened and sabotages our efforts. We might be able to sustain our practice for a while but eventually the force of our conditioning will reassert itself and throw us back into the grooves of our habitual ways - the psyche always strives for homeostasis. It's important to acknowledge our samskaras and go from where we are, one step at a time. Running ahead of ourselves and doing too advanced practices or more practices than we can handle will not only make us go backwards but will likely lead to accidents that can severely damage our physiology and mental equilibrium for months or years. Yogic practices have a strong effect on all the layers of our being and always need to be approached with respect, intelligence and right motivation. In this work going slowly but steadily leads to fast progress. Every step that we take needs to be supported by a proper foundation and enough time to adapt to the changes in the bodymind that the practices bring. Ambition is of no use here because it binds us more tightly to the chains that we want to break free from, rather what is called for is enthusiasm - Divine inspiration. Remember: This journey is not about getting anywhere but being here.

To pace ourselves is one of the most important skills to ride the wave of transformation well. We need to constantly modulate the flame and adjust our lifestyle and practices according to our changing ability for Kundalini-adaptation. Here formulas are of no use. What is needed is awareness of our capacities, attunement pranic rhythms and an inner listening to the guidance of Evolutionary Intelligence. Sometimes a titanic effort is needed to break through the barriers of our conditioning. At other times our efforts will get in the way and a complete surrender and relaxation is being called for.

It is helpful to regularly ask ourselves the following questions: Am I having the resources to actively work with the process? Am I in a safe and supportive environment for it? In which phase of kundalini am I? Is effort or letting go called for? When we notice resistance we can either back off and reduce the heat of the flames for a while or we can add more fuel to burn through it. Backing off can be achieved through a protein-rich and heavy diet (and eating something every 3 hours), drinking alcohol, actively focusing on the physical dimension of life, being around grounded people and interrupting our meditation, just to name a few. Through a raw food diet, fasting, solitude, being in the presence of spiritual teachers and spiritual practice we can increase the intensity of the flames when we have the nerve strength for it and are in a conducive environment.

However for a true alchemical change to happen an integral and balanced way of life is needed as otherwise our realization cannot be integrated and we are burdened by what we know but cannot live. By moving with intelligence and sensitivity, balancing effort with surrender, and honoring cosmic timing, transformation can unfold safely and sustainably. This is not a path of force but of ever finer attunement to the dance of life.

Liberation Through Experience and Meditation

February 16, 2025

Experiencing the Unborn is the answer to the existential problem of man. In it the tension between the opposites ends and one stays untouched by life and death. There are two ways of approaching it, one liberates and the other leads to ever deeper bondage. If we search for Reality to avoid the pain of our worldly existence, we shall find it not. Motivated by aversion we will get ever more bound to that which we are trying to avoid. Thinking that we are free from desire for worldly things when actually our desires are blocked by aversion is not renunciation but self-deceit. True renunciation is born out of discernment between that which is real and ephemeral. It is the natural result of coming face to face with the human condition. Both the renunciant and the escapist are moving away from the world, one does so out of wisdom the other out of fear and frustration. If our search for freedom is faltering it usurps life and death and we taste neither the fruits of this world nor of the Beyond. As said by Ramakrishna, "do not seek illumination unless you seek it as a man whose hair is on fire seeks a pond".

There is another answer to meaninglessness for those of us who are not ablaze and want to enjoy the fruits of this world: to become Love. By expanding the frontier of our small self and becoming ever more inclusive we release ourselves from the narrow grip of anxiety. Our focus of concern then shifts away from neurotic self-occupation to the All - anxiety has lost its purpose. Only when fear has lost its stranglehold on us can we live a true life and surrender into eternity's mouth when our time has come. Fully drowning in life is the worldly road to freedom. Ultimately, both paths are one because both love and renunciation destroy ego-identification.

Limitations of the Physical Paradigm

February 17, 2025

Working solely on the physical level often addresses only the surface of disease, as the root imbalance lies deeper. We may stretch and strengthen for years, feeling better temporarily, but if muscular imbalances stem from the mind, our efforts will eventually be undone by ingrained mental patterns. Mastering advanced asanas can create the illusion of deep physical integration when, in reality, we may just be mesmerized by external appearances and a fleeting feeling of high. In the pursuit of "getting there," we risk reinforcing the very imbalances we seek to correct. True transformation is not about what we can do on the mat but how we live our lives. If we cannot maintain posture in daily life, our practice remains superficial. And true posture is not merely physical - it is a state of resting in oneself, which leads to natural poise in every posture and movement. Likewise is true strength and flexibility created by the mind. It is an attitude with which we approach experience.

It is easy to believe we are taking control of our health simply because we engage in physical practices like exercise or dieting. Yet, in many cases, we are merely treading water. When dealing with mind-body syndromes, symptom-focused treatments can even hinder healing by reinforcing the belief that the body is broken and needs fixing. While some external practices can help relax the body-mind and build resilience, for lasting change we have to go deeper. Healing is more than treating disease - it is about embracing our wounds, nurturing our connection to the Self, and attuning to the environment in which we live.

That said, the physical can still serve as a gateway to deeper transformation - there are no separated parts within us. With the right attitude and focus, physical training can become a tool for spiritual opening, releasing trauma and energetic blockages, and preparing the body to hold prana shakti.

Energy-Cultivation

February 18, 2025

All the processes of life, from cellular respiration to supernovas, rely on prana for their activity. Prana is the lifeforce that permeates the space within and around us and that sustains every atom of the cosmos. It is the intelligent creatrix that dances the world. We are constantly bathing in a field of infinite energy whose utilization gets limited only by the state of our energy body which transmits prana into electrical signals which are then being conducted through the nervous system into all the cells of our body. When our energy body is weakened, damaged or distorted and its channels are clogged or deactivated the various parts of our body do not receive the pranic supply that is needed for optimal functioning.

The basic concern of yoga therapy is to create a high energetic state which is the necessary condition for the bodymind to heal itself and which helps us to go beyond the fluctuations of the gunas. Health is not the ultimate aim of yoga therapy, as nothing in this world is permanent and our bodies are designed to die. We focus on healing only until the bodymind does not bother us anymore so that we can realign with that aspect of our being that is the source of health and wellbeing and that is forever unaffected by the miseries of life.

Energy-cultivation is a way of living that restores the natural harmony and alignment of our organism by constantly increasing our supply of prana and its absorption while at the same time sealing any energetic leaks and removing the obstructions to the pranic flow. This allows prana to get evenly distributed throughout the whole organism and thereby nourishing all the cells, tissues, organs and glands. Instead of going through cycles of pranic depletion and restoration, always needing to recharge with drugs and other fixes, energy cultivation allows us to continuously move upwards towards ever increasing freedom and wellbeing and beyond duality. The increased energy supply helps us to become resilient towards the stressors of life and to let go of the neurotic coping mechanisms that decrease our vitality. In times of crisis this surplus is available to us to speed up the healing process. It allows us to counterbalance mistakes in lifestyle and to give to people in need.

There are numerous ways of depleting our lifeforce as everything we do, even supposed beneficial actions, can be done unskillfully and with unnecessary energy expenditure. Following are the biggest taxes on our lifeforce:

- Excess of anything (working, studying, thinking, talking, sex...)
- Stress
- Being addicted to emotions and suppressing emotions
- Lack of sleep
- Wrong food
- Overeating and undereating
- Screen time

- EMF
- Wrong company
- Stimulants
- Temperature extremes
- Negative thought patterns
- Bodily abuse and unskillfulness (unnecessary effort and tension)

Disease, whether "mental" or "physical", can be understood as a low energetic state caused by incorrect ways of living. Over time the taxing effect of weakening every day decisions builds up and depletes prana. When our pranic supply becomes exhausted we cannot properly digest and absorb nutrients. The elimination of wastes becomes impaired and they start to accumulate causing congestion and toxicity. Once our blood becomes toxic and our tissues damaged we experience symptoms of disease which are the body's natural response to rid itself of the accumulated toxins. If we keep poisoning ourselves we go through various stages of escalation leading to cancer and finally death. The higher the tax on our lifeforce through unnatural living and the higher our toxin load the more prone we become to disease. A high supply of prana helps the body to rid itself of wastes and thereby to stay relatively healthy with a moderate toxin load but that still falls short from true vitality.

To reverse the process of disease we need to create a surplus of prana through a natural way of living in conjunction with yogic practices and detoxification. Ideally this becomes our way of being in the world rather than something that we do periodically to compensate for the abuse of ourselves. For vibrant health every aspect of our life needs to be examined. We need to be willing to radically change our lifestyle, abandon our dear addictions, and follow the necessary discipline no matter how long it takes. This part of the process demands continuous effort as we have to undo years or decades of abusing ourselves. Depending on the stage of the disease process that we are at it can take anything from weeks to years. It is the effort and commitment that we put into it which determines the outcome and speed of recovery.

The fundamental practice of energy cultivation is awareness. First we have to look at the ways in which we invest our energy and aim at optimizing every aspect of our lives in terms of energy use. This means that we need to overcome the tendency of robotically following habitual patterns and create a pause between impulse and action. Every decision of our daily lives, whether big or small, needs to be a conscious one directed towards sattva and thereby strengthening our whole being. Once we let go of our unnatural ways of living and stop interfering with nature, healing happens by itself. The body's innate intelligence knows how to heal, our only task is to provide the necessary conditions for it to happen.

Following is a list of practices that help with energy cultivation. Keep in mind that yogic practices are not meant to be a band-aid or quick fix but tools for daily maintenance that prevent disease and restore health when needed.

- Pranayama
- Asana

- Meditation and chanting
- Easily-digestible food (raw fruits and vegetables)
- Sun gazing and sun bathing
- Time spent in nature
- Rest (no doing, no stimulation)
- Sleep hygiene
- Mental silence
- Sexual energy sublimation

Living in the modern world is highly taxing on our lifeforce and it takes a great deal of effort to reclaim our birthright of true health and vitality. Civilization encourages us to gradually work towards our own demise and accept an imposter version of life. We age undeservingly and faster than intended by nature and what is generally called health is nothing but normalized disease. At the root of our unnatural and destructive way of living lies a fundamental disconnect from nature, both within and without. Our neurotic behavior is but a compensation for the abandonment of the ground of our being. If we want to have a true life we have to walk the narrow path and face opposition and ridicule from the ones that are brainwashed by cult-ure and the medical cartel. Without unshakable faith in nature's laws we will not succeed and succumb to the pathology of the masses. In its essence energy cultivation is about realigning ourselves with the laws of nature and reintegrating the split of aspects of our being that were deemed too savage for cult-ure.

Free Will?

February 19, 2025

Are we mere puppets of internal programs and external suggestions? Are our choices as free as we imagine them to be? Can we will what we want? Where do our desires come from? Countless factors shape our decisions - mood, hormones, gut biome, energy levels, health, beliefs, material circumstances, imagination, archetypes, conditioning, and subtle, unseen forces. Every choice arises from a nexus of causes stretching back to the beginningless beginning. Our dear desires are often nothing more than an echo - effects born of other effects, programs of the conditioned self leading us deeper into unconscious repetition and bondage.

Yet, beneath this web of influences, there is one desire that is truly ours, that is neither imposed nor conditioned - the desire to become what we are meant to be. It is this longing that calls us beyond our programming, beyond illusion, toward the essence of our true nature. And in answering that call, we find freedom.

Note: egoic desires to pursue pleasure and avoid pain vs. playful desires to create

By closing the doors to outside interference, nurturing our health and energy levels, and becoming aware of our conditioning, we expand our freedom of choice, creating beneficial neural pathways that lead to more conscious decisions. Yet, what truly moves us is not personal will but the One Breath—the unseen force that animates all things.

We are but ripples in the ocean of existence, echoes of the primal cause. The expansion and contraction of the universes, the unfolding dramas of the chain of beings, are already inscribed in the mind of the One. Our only true freedom lies in saying "yes" to our destiny. When we surrender to our divine blueprint and allow the One to flow through us, we transcend the limitations of the conditioned mind and step into a deeper freedom - the freedom of being what we are meant to be.

Causes of Disease

February 20, 2025

Root Causes

Spiritual Disconnection – Loss of joy, purpose, and connection to nature, self, and the Divine affects the balance along all the koshas.

Stress & Suppressed Emotions – Emotional blockages create energetic stagnation, weaken the immune system, and contribute to nervous system dysregulation.

These together result in suppressed or misdirected lifeforce, leading to enervating lifestyle habits and poor daily choices, the secondary causes of disease. Prolonged enervation weakens eliminative functions, preventing the body from expelling metabolic toxins. Over time the bloodstream becomes toxic and disease symptoms arise as the body's attempt to clean itself.

Biological Disruptors

Vaccines – Introduce foreign substances that can disrupt immune function, introduce heavy metals, and trigger chronic inflammation.

Antibiotics – Destroy gut flora, leading to immune dysfunction, digestive issues, and systemic imbalances.

Lifestyle & Environmental Burdens

Diet (Acid-Forming, Mucus-Forming, Processed Foods) – Creates chronic acidosis, inflammation, and lymphatic stagnation.

Dehydration – Reduces the body's ability to detox, leading to sluggish lymphatic flow and cellular dysfunction.

Heavy Metal Poisoning – Accumulates in tissues, affecting the nervous system, brain, and immune function.

Chemicals in Water, Foods, and Cosmetics – Daily exposure to endocrine disruptors, synthetic toxins, and carcinogens that overload detox pathways.

Evanescence

February 21, 2025

A deep sorrow rises within me, as old as life, that everything withers and fades into the sands. The Worldsoul inhales, and all worlds vanish. It exhales and gives birth to the multitude of beings - for but a fleeting moment. Endlessly, the worlds arise; endlessly, they pass away. Behind us, countless beings, scattered like dust; before us, the same boundlessness. Creation follows destruction, day follows night, one experience after the other... until all sinks into oblivion, and two becomes One.

Without a second, the One does not know that it is. Infinity can only perceive itself through finiteness - through us. Forever we are dancing to the pulse of its heartbeat, manifesting from its desire, in ever-changing form. I see a flower that opens and closes, without beginning, without end. We are its fragrance, a drop in the ocean of existence, here for a blink of an eye in eternity. We are fodder for worms, we are earth, we are the empty space in atoms. And when our story ends, we will live on in the wind.

Cessation of All Possibilities

February 22, 2025

Death is the mother of life and mortality a question:

What matters?

To live ablaze,

let no ashes remain.

The last breath leaves the body, the limbs grow stiff, and I sink into primordial darkness. All possibilities end, abruptly. My story is over, once and for all. And I? What remains untouched by death? Existence - nothing opposes it. When the plug is pulled, the images on the screen vanish, but the screen remains untouched.

Death is the end of human experience, the end of all that has a beginning in time. World, body and mind are fleeting images, not eternal reality. They belong in the hands of death. There is no escape for the one who seeks it, every costume needs to be shed. "It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter God's kingdom." My identities must remain outside. Only that which was never born can cross the sea of death.

Even if I die while alive, identifying with the screen that holds all experience, a human still dwells within me, who does not want to die. I may suppress fear through faith and other protective mechanisms, yet deep inside, it has sunk its teeth into me. Even the wise are not spared - it is biological. Is transcendence true solace? Can the screen perceive itself without images? We have to take the journey and cross the threshold to know. And to fully live and burn in this moment, all life-saving promises of a life to come need to be sacrificed. For the glory of life shines brightest for those who embrace its impermanence with full awareness.

Sleep is rehearsal for dying - as is DMT. Every night, in deep sleep, death kisses me as the absence of experience. Without an object to reflect upon, light appears as darkness and the subject does not know that it is. In this emptiness there lives fullness - the great mystery.

Tapas

February 23, 2025

Suffering serves as a cleansing agent, helping to dissolve mental toxins, limiting identities and beliefs and deeply held traumas. Just as physical disease is the body's way of expelling toxins to heal itself, mental disease can serve as a process of purification, when embraced rather than resisted or suppressed. An often misunderstood example of mental purging is psychosis. In modern society, those experiencing psychotic episodes are typically stigmatized as "insane" and are being locked away in mental wards, heavily medicated to suppress symptoms. Yet what is "sick" is not the extreme state the person is suffering from, but the socio-culturally conditioned personality that seeks to disintegrate through it, allowing the person's true essence to emerge. When resisted and suppressed due to lack of understanding, the person is denied a chance of growth and deeper personal integration - the initiation is aborted and a healer lost in limbo.

There are two ways of suffering: conscious suffering and mechanical suffering. Conscious suffering is a non-reactive stance toward pain, allowing it to pass through awareness without resistance or attachment. In this state, we neither avoid nor dwell in pain but recognize it as a temporary visitor. This approach dissolves the seeds of future suffering and is gateway to freedom.

In yoga, the practice of tapas is used to generate inner fire through discipline and conscious endurance of discomfort, often taking the form of fasting, prolonged chanting, intense asana and pranayama or cold exposure. Tapas is not about suffering for its own sake but about using challenge as a tool for purification and growth. By staying present with discomfort instead of resisting it, we build strength and free ourselves from reactive conditioning.

However, embracing pain does not mean actively digging for it in the psyche. We only work with what life naturally brings to the surface. Another common misconception is that we must remain with our emotional pains until they transform. While it is important to extract the message pain carries, whether it be physical or non-physical, lingering in it unnecessarily serves no purpose. Would you advise someone with a broken bone to focus on their pain? Pain is a danger signal and lets us know when there is something wrong with our body, but once the message is received, staying with it only prolongs it.

Mechanical suffering is an unconscious reaction to pain, born from resistance. When resisted, the seeds of unresolved pain are not released and remain dormant in the karmashaya of the mind, waiting to be triggered, perpetuating future cycles of action and painful consequences until fully processed and released. In this way, suffering becomes an addictive cycle. Trying to control suffering is like chopping off Hydra's heads - no matter how many times you cut it down, it finds new expressions. To go beyond suffering we have to uproot the tendencies that keep it alive, we have to chop off our own head.

To sum it up: Suffering, as resistance, can and should be avoided. But pain is an unavoidable fact of life and, when met with awareness, should be lovingly embraced as an opportunity to purge the mind of its limiting programs. In this light, suffering becomes God's call to us - an invitation to see and release that which sustains our imagined separation.

Radical Openness

February 24, 2025

Peace is not merely the absence of war but an openness in which everything is allowed to be as it is - a profound and unconditional "yes" to the ever-changing and unfolding process of life. It is the recognition that What-Is neither needs to be nor can be different from how it is, for it is the spontaneous expression of Evolutionary Intelligence, always moving toward deeper integrity.

Yet, this welcoming embrace does not mean passively tolerating unfavorable circumstances. Rather, it invites us to allow the content of our awareness to arise and dissolve freely, so that action emerges naturally from openness rather than resistance.

Our beliefs about how things 'ought to be' are mental fictions—brick walls between us and Reality. Suffering arises only when we blindly crash against those walls. What-Is is exactly as it must be, or else it would not be as it is. It is our attempt to fit experience into the narrow confines of cultural conditioning that turns it into a 'problem' - something to be fixed, fought, or escaped. But experience itself is never the problem; the problem lies in our ignorant way of relating to it.

All problems are self-created. All solutions lie in no longer seeing a 'problem' - in seeing with new eyes. When we allow experience to unfold freely, we are carried by the mystery of life back home. And in that homecoming, the One recognizes itself in both expansion and contraction, in both heaven and hell.

Nervous System Regulation

February 26, 2025

Self-regulation is the first step of the great work. When our nervous system is dysregulated, we experience a distorted perception of reality - all claws and teeth. Every action that grows out of this misperception deepens our ignorance, keeping us trapped in patterned responses. As long as we believe in fear and act accordingly, we cannot grow in love.

However, it is crucial to seal the trigger point of our fear and process the underlying samskaras after regulating our nervous system. Otherwise, we are merely applying a band-aid until the next trigger will open the wound once more, postponing deeper integration. We want to break the chains of fear once and for all, don't we?

Triggers are opportunities to free ourselves from the programming of the past. Symptoms of amygdala hijacking—such as emotional overwhelm, anxiety, or shutdown—invite us to go within and compassionately embrace our wounding. Likewise, the people who push our buttons are not to be condemned but seen as messengers, revealing where our past remains unintegrated. Fighting the messenger means mistaking our projections for reality, thereby reenacting past dramas. To break free from conditioned reactivity, we must train ourselves to pause before acting, creating space between stimulus and response. And from this innocence pause, true spontaneity arises.

Under a Tree

February 27, 2025

My feverish search comes to an end in the cooling shade of a tree called Truth.
Under its loving roof
I bury what I thought to be me.
O what a fool I was,
mesmerized by the branches' fruits.
Reaching in vain
for what belongs to none,
I now lie flat on the ground growing roots.

Intelligent Practice

February 28, 2025

Yogic practice is both a science and an art, requiring a lifetime of dedication to truly master. When done correctly it can move us beyond the conflict of the pairs of opposites and into the blissful heart of existence. Practicing in a wrong will reassert the samskaras of our suffering and move us deeper into bondage. Therefore it must always be approached with the utmost reverence and full awareness, ultimately it is about cultivating our relationship with our innermost self.

What follows comes from my own practice—and from making nearly every mistake possible. My hope is to spare you at least some of them, but mistakes you must do as they are an essential part of learning. So, better to learn to fail than to fail to learn.

- Life shapes practice. Sleep, food, emotions, relationships, environment, and daily choices either support or weaken your practice. Be especially mindful about everything you do after 7 pm as it sets the foundation for your energy and focus the next morning.
- Practice shapes life. What you do on your mat is a reflection of how you live your life. When you practice with tension or push yourself this will show itself in the activities of daily life.
- Balance structure with spontaneity. Iron discipline is essential, but rigidity leads to unawareness. What was helpful yesterday might be a hindrance today. Listen to your body's intelligence and adjust your practice accordingly.
- Do your part, then surrender. Put in effort where it is needed without forcing results. When you have done everything that lies within your power, let go and trust the deeper intelligence of life
- Check in before every session. Sit still, scan your body and mind, and ask: What is my current state? What do I need today? Is there anything that needs my attention? Let your practice be guided by the moment.
- Self-regulation first. Practice is not a band-aid to feel better or a way to avoid ourselves, used in that way it will backfire. When you are not regulated, inquire into the cause of your suffering and remove it first.
- Clarity of intention. Set a clear intention before practice. Intention creates a channel for deeper learning and helps you persist through difficulties. Without clarity the information you receive will be diffuse as well. It can help to keep an image that represents your highest aspiration in front of you and use it as a focal point whenever your mind becomes lazy, confused or scattered.
- Keep your practice sacred and private. Especially in the early stages, avoid discussing it with others. Outside thoughtforms may enter your mind and create doubts and distractions. Keep it a sacred communion between you and the creative intelligence of life.
- Don't seek instant balance. Removing imbalance is a gradual process. Sudden shifts disrupt homeostasis and can create more instability.

- Break dogmas at the right time. Structure is necessary to cultivate energy, but becoming rigid in your beliefs or methods leads to stagnation. Occasionally stepping outside your patterns is necessary to maintain freedom.
- Progress comes from crossing limits. Never justify your limitations or say that you can't do something – practice is about making the impossible possible. Growth means constantly challenging yourself, but without force. Forcing the body creates further imprints of pain. Muscles harden, flexibility decreases, and the nervous system resists.
- Play the edge instead of pushing into maximum range. Increased strength and flexibility, whether physical or mental, comes from working just beyond your comfort zone, not from overextending. Always stay at your edge but do not go so far that you create a sympathetic response. Once a negative association is established it is hard to undo it. You want to look forward to each and every session and do not become resistant towards it.
- Sustainable effort prevents setbacks. Overloading yourself with too much practice at once will cause imbalances. Practice shall never become a burden and discipline never a prison. Yoga is a timeless process so integrate the limbs one after the other during the course of your whole life. Understand where you are and do not try to get ahead of yourself. At the initial levels focus on one limb only until you become proficient and stable in it. Whenever you are starting a new practice, do it for at least one mandala of 30 days before adding another. This ensures that you make your next step from a firm foundation.
- Never break the chain – it maintains you. If you are following a specific daily routine to address a health issue or working towards spiritual aims, practice only as much as you can practice on the day with your lowest level of energy. You don't want to go up and down with your practice but develop an unbroken effort and intensity to build up tapas. Even on low-energy days, when sick, or when traveling, maintain a minimal practice, no matter what. Showing up consistently is more important than doing a lot.
- Never practice when tense—always cultivate joy first. If your mind is agitated and your body tense, take time to regulate yourself before beginning. Forced practice reinforces stress.
- Do not chase results. End-gaining destroys awareness and may lead to injury. Instead practice so that you are able to contribute to the world around you.
- Don't make yoga an addiction. When your happiness depends on your practice you lose your freedom to it. Remember that practice is a tool for awareness that helps you to get better at life. You do not live to practice but practice to live well. When you are going to leave this world you cannot take it with you, so learn to be without attachment. The moment you create an identity around your practice you have reach a dead-end.
- Only do what you can counterbalance. Every force has a counterforce. Only when the upward and downward currents are balanced can the results of practice be integrated. And don't forget to acknowledge your darkness - the shadow grows the closer you move towards the light.

To conclude: If you want your practice to bear fruits, pay attention to every detail of your life and do not blindly follow the fluctuations of your mind, instead make every decision, big or small, a conscious one that moves you closer towards sattva. Eat nourishing and clean food, surround yourself with happy people, keep your attention directed inwards and sleep well.

Faith

March 1, 2025

I am a wanderer
in the land of uncertainty,
with no orientation,
no ground to stand on.
Not knowing where I am
or what is next,
I become friends
with the unknown.
Everything is in motion—
I am helpless, like a child.
All I can do is trust
in the power
that knows the way.

Consecration

March 2, 2025

Yoga sadhana is not about personal evolution but about removing all programs and blockages that hinder the free expression of Love. In the last hour of life, it will not matter how many samadhis we have experienced—they have a beginning and an end—but only whether we have truly lived Love, for in it lies all purpose and eternity. To place all actions in the context of Love is to consecrate our life to the Divine. This is true yoga.

Dance of Consciousness

March 3, 2025

"Good" and "evil" are but programs in the dual mind, mechanisms of control that bind us to an artificial, secondary duality, distorting our perception and relation to life. Life simply is—an ever-unfolding dance on the screen of consciousness. There is no true separation between the fox and the rabbit it consumes, neither between the hunter who shoots the fox and the owl that is the silent witness, there is only One, endlessly transforming, playing hide and seek with itself.

Nature often appears cruel, showing no mercy on her children, but even destructive forces like hurricanes and earthquakes maintain the delicate balance of life. All is but a gift, that which animates and that which kills, expressing the eternal pulse of the One. In the same way, the so-called "evil" serves a purpose in the evolution of consciousness, one that we haven't understood yet. The battle against perceived evil, on a personal and global scale, is but an enactment of our internal battles. For what we reject in the world are the unclaimed parts of ourselves.

The One is indifferent to our suffering because it is unknown to It. Only a divided mind, in conflict with What-is, creates suffering. It is the price of our only, and imagined, sin—separation. Yet as humans, we are at the same time relative beings, called to respond to the world and take a stance toward that which kills the heart. Love is not the universal answer; only that which knows love can be transformed by it. Some things are not meant to be embraced with love but to be firmly confronted.

The absolute view offers no guidance for navigating the human realm. We do not live from the crown, absorbed in mystical oneness, indifferent to the suffering within and without, but from the heart, where we are one with mankind, and its pain is our own. Non-duality is not the ultimate truth, but simply another way of seeing and relating. In this dance of existence, both perspectives—the infinite and the finite—must meet and find expression in love.

Detox Progression

March 22, 2025

Principles for a Smooth Dietary Transition

- Respect the Stages of Refinement – Never skip stages when refining your diet. Transition step by step to allow your body to adjust properly.
- Gradual Progression is Key – Clean up your diet in stages, establishing stable plateaus before moving deeper. This prevents "detox shock" and ensures a sustainable transition.
- Personalization is Essential – The right transitional foods depend on your toxicity levels, past eating habits, latent or chronic conditions, and physiological constitution. Listen to your body's needs.
- Support Elimination – Detox is not just about what you remove from your diet but also how efficiently your body eliminates waste. Support your kidneys, lymphatic system, and bowels through hydration, movement, deep breathing, and herbal support if needed.
- Honor Your Nervous System – Detox can be intense, and emotional releases often accompany physical cleansing. Make sure to incorporate rest, grounding practices, and stress management to maintain stability throughout the transition.
- Counteract Mucus-Forming Foods – If consuming mucus-forming foods during raw or detox stages, balance them with astringent fruits like grapes or melons to aid elimination.
- Balance Cleansing with Rebuilding – Detoxification should always be followed by phases of tissue regeneration and nourishment. Fruits cleanse, while vegetables rebuild and strengthen.

Phases of Dietary Refinement

Gentle Transition (Foundation)

- Intermittent fasting – Skip breakfast and avoid eating late at night.
- Remove processed foods – Eliminate sugars, coffee, alcohol, and refined foods.
- Remove dairy and eggs – Meals are mainly cooked mucus-lean (e.g. grains with large raw salads to minimize mucus effects).

Reducing Mucus-Forming Foods (Gentle Cleansing)

- Remove grains and legumes – Transition to cooked mucusless foods (e.g., root vegetables, squashes, and non-starchy vegetables in combination with raw salads).
- Increase raw intake – Include smoothies, juices, germinated nuts, seeds, and sprouts.

Moving towards a Fully Raw Diet (Deeper Cleansing)

- Remove oils, vinegars, spices, and supplements – Simplify meals to whole, natural foods.
- Remove all cooked foods – Shift to an entirely raw diet.

Deep Detoxification (Cellular Purification and Regeneration)

- Remove whole food fats – Eliminate avocados, nuts, and seeds; meals consist of raw fruits, greens, and starchless vegetables.
- Adapt mono-fruit meals – Consume only one type of fruit per meal; leafy greens may be added during tissue rebuilding phases.

Fasting Integration (System Reset)

- Slowly incorporate fasting – Begin with 24-hour fasting days.
- Juice fasting
- Water fasting
- Dry fasting – No food or water for set periods (advanced phase).

Shifting Between Detoxification and Tonification

To avoid exhausting and depleting your body, it is essential to alternate between phases of detoxification and tonification. This cyclical approach ensures that the body eliminates waste effectively while maintaining strength and stability. When you cultivate deep listening, your body will intuitively signal when it's time to shift gears.

Detoxification Phase: Hydration, Alkalinity, and Elimination

Primary Goal: Deep cellular cleansing and elimination of mucus and metabolic waste.

Fruits as the Catalyst: High-water-content fruits flood the system with structured water, creating an alkaline environment that dissolves mucus and stagnant lymphatic waste. Their astringent and hydrating nature supports tissue detoxification, while their high enzymatic activity breaks down accumulated debris.

Signs It's Time to Shift:

- Increased sensitivity, fatigue, or depletion.
- Consistent feelings of weakness or coldness.
- Loss of grounding or excessive emotional release without integration.

Tonification Phase: Rebuilding, Strengthening, and Stabilizing

Primary Goal: Replenish mineral reserves, strengthen tissues, and restore balance after detox.

Leafy Greens and Vegetables: During this phase, nutrient-dense vegetables, particularly mineral-rich leafy greens supply minerals and chlorophyll, which support tissue repair and replenish electrolytes. These foods help rebuild strength and stabilize the nervous system after intensive detox.

Supplementation as Support: Depending on individual needs, carefully chosen supplements (e.g. plant-based minerals, trace elements, or adaptogenic herbs) may be introduced to enhance nutrient absorption and assist the body in restoring balance.

Signs It's Time to Shift:

- Stabilized energy levels and grounding.
- A sense of strength returning to the body.
- Reduced detox symptoms and improved digestion.

Food Combinations and Categories

March 26, 2025

The following guidelines may seem overly restrictive to the pleasure-driven eater, who might realize they violate many of them daily without noticing any immediate consequences. This lack of awareness often leads them to dismiss these principles as unnecessary or overly rigid. However, this is usually so because they have become accustomed to a state of diminished vitality and a less-than-optimally functioning digestive system. Without a having tasted true vitality and refined organ awareness, it's difficult to recognize the subtle but cumulative strain caused by poor food combinations.

These principles are especially relevant for those cultivating energy for smooth kundalini flow or those committed to increasing their health and vitality. Harmonizing digestion ensures that prana is not diverted from its upward trajectory, allowing kundalini to rise smoothly without unnecessary stagnation or depletion. For those focused on cellular regeneration, proper food combinations reduce digestive burden, freeing up energy for tissue repair and detoxification.

Every food group requires distinct enzymatic environments for proper breakdown. Mixing foods that demand opposing enzymes—such as starches and proteins—creates digestive confusion, leading to incomplete digestion, fermentation, and toxicity. Poor combinations force the body to expend extra energy managing this digestive confusion, diverting prana that could otherwise fuel higher states of awareness or cellular repair.

Keep in mind that these are not rigid dogmas but tools for self-exploration. Cultivating curiosity and observing how different combinations affect energy, digestion, and mental clarity is key. The most important principle to remember is simplicity—fewer ingredients in a meal lead to easier digestion, allowing the body to channel energy toward healing, regeneration, and subtle energy flow.

Good Combinations (Easy Digestion & Nutrient Absorption)

- Fruit + Leafy Greens (e.g., banana + spinach, apple + lettuce)
- Dried Fruit + Protein Fats (not as a full meal) (e.g., dates + almonds, figs + tahini) → Balances sugar release.
- Animal Protein + Non-Starchy Vegetables (e.g., fish + steamed greens) → Prevents fermentation.
- Starchy Vegetables + Non-Starchy Vegetables (e.g., sweet potato + zucchini)
- Protein Fats + Non-Starchy Vegetables (e.g., avocado + spinach, nuts + greens)
- Grains (Protein Starches) + Any Vegetables → Reduces acidity of grains, improving digestion.
- Neutral Foods (Combine Well with Almost Anything Except Melon)
    - Leafy greens, algae, cucumber, bell peppers, zucchini, sprouts
    - Fermented foods

Bad Combinations (Difficult Digestion, Fermentation, and Toxin Formation)

- Fruit + Protein Fats (e.g., banana + nuts) → Fruit digests fast, fats slow it down → fermentation.
- Fruit + Animal Protein (e.g., steak + berries) → Creates putrefaction in the gut.
- Fruit + Grains (e.g., oatmeal + banana) → Sugar ferments while grains digest slowly.
- Animal Protein + Protein Fats (e.g., meat + nuts, eggs + cheese) → Overloads digestion.
- Animal Protein + Starchy Vegetables (e.g., chicken + potatoes) → Proteins need acid, starches need alkaline → digestive conflict.
- Animal Protein + Grains (e.g., steak + rice) → Heavy, slow digestion.
- Protein Fats + Starchy Vegetables (ok in small amounts) (e.g., avocado + potato) → Fats slow starch digestion, potential bloating.
- Protein Fats + Grains (ok in small amounts) (e.g., peanut butter + bread) → Harder to digest, mucus-forming.
- Melon With Anything (Always eat melon first an wait 30 minutes before eating anything else) → Melons digest extremely fast, anything slower causes fermentation.

Fruit Combinations

Good Combinations

- Sweet Fruits + Sweet Fruits
- Sweet Fruits + Sub-Acid Fruits
- Sub-Acid Fruits + Sub-Acid Fruits

Walking Through Fire

April 12, 2025

O Pakistan, mirror of emptiness, land of my undoing.
Who am I when no one sees me,
when my story dissolves
and no role remains to contain me?
You stripped me to the bone,
scorched and muted
with honest brutality.
And in that silence
you carved a hollow wide enough
for depth to emerge,
beyond identity.
Naked, vulnerable, open,
I welcome the unguarded life,
to flow through the desert of me.
May this void be sacred.

Between Lifetimes

April 12, 2025

In the ashes of his practices
the yogi sits—shapeless,
unbound by discipline,
breathing softly:
Even this is the path.
When all agendas fall away,
only presence remains—
and the raw pulse of life.

The Shadow Father and Talibanism: A Mirror of Collective Wounding

April 14, 2025

Note: This text was not written by myself but arose from a communication with ChatGPT about the psychodynamics of religious extremism while I was in Pakistan. Although it doesn't speak in my own voice, I still deem it valuable to share.

When the sacred masculine is absent, when there is no wise, protective, and compassionate father, the psyche compensates by forming the shadow father: a rigid, punitive, and authoritarian figure that is consumed with control and power. On the personal level this archetype manifests as self-denial, harsh discipline, and suppression of feeling, as an inner voice that demands perfection and punishes failure. On the collective level, it becomes ideology, literalism, and violent patriarchy. It is the internalized legacy of trauma: the child who had no safe authority figure now governs themselves through the harsh lens of survival.

Talibanism is a crystallized expression of the shadow father: a militarized, ideological father-force promising protection through total submission. Born from cultural humiliation, invasion, and tribal disintegration, it offers psychological safety via strict laws, but its structure is hollow, built on wounded masculinity, not sacred stewardship. It promises protection but delivers fear. Its version of God is law, not love. Women, as carriers of the sensual, the intuitive, the uncontrolled, become projection surfaces for what patriarchy fears and cannot integrate. The feminine principle, within psyche and society, is cast as seductive, chaotic, and dangerous. And so it must be veiled, beaten, or owned. This violence reveals a deeper truth: what is not mastered inwardly will be controlled outwardly. The rejected feminine becomes the hunted shadow.

To engage with extremism out there, we must see the archetype within. Not to condone, but to understand the psyche's strategy under trauma, because only what we understand can we transcend without replicating. The Taliban and similar extremist groups are not merely enemies to be fought, but symptoms of collective trauma and archetypal imbalance—political expressions of deep psychic wounds left unaddressed.

This shadow dynamic—the distorted father and suppressed feminine—mirrors the historic relationship between East and West, especially through the lenses of colonization, ideology, and spiritual estrangement.

The West entered much of the East not as a respectful elder, but as an imposing father figure, claiming superiority, enforcing systems, and disregarding local wisdom. The colonizer became the external tyrant, projecting "civilization" while uprooting indigenous rhythms, spiritual traditions, and organic social orders. This humiliation created an archetypal wound: a castration of sovereignty, memory, and identity. In response, some parts of the East internalized the same tyrant energy, birthing extremist movements like the Taliban as a form of survival-based dignity reclamation. If grace couldn't protect, then severity would.

The West, in parallel, lost its connection to the sacred through secular materialism, repressing the mystical, intuitive and embodied aspect of life in the name of reason. The East, rich in these feminine qualities, became both feared and exoticized. Yet both sides, in different ways, rejected the feminine: the West exiled it to the fringes of mysticism; the East sought to silence and dominate it.

A mutual projection emerged:

- The West projecting irrationality and backwardness onto the East.
- The East projecting corruption and soullessness onto the West.

In this mirror of mutual distortion, both lost contact with the sacred union of masculine and feminine, inner and outer, reason and mystery. What remained was a fracture—an inner split that echoed outward into culture and belief. Out of this split, the shadow father emerged, grasping for control where connection was lost.

Yet the shadow dissolves not through opposition, but through remembrance. It begins to unravel when true inner authority is reclaimed—when we embody presence, not domination; wisdom, not ideology. And when we dare to see extremism not as an enemy, but as a distorted cry for sacred structure in a world that has forgotten how to protect what is most tender.

Prayer

May 11, 2025

Worldsoul, here I am, your child.
From you I come, in you I live, and to you I shall return.
My life rests in your hands.
Lead me to where you long for me to be.
Allow me to hear your whisper in my heart and grant me clarity and courage to follow it unconditionally.
Even when my path darkens and I cannot see meaning,
I trust in your boundless goodness - for you are the light that burns within me and the wisdom that carries me through all times.
May my life be a prayer,
my path a song of return,
and my heart ever remember you.
Your will is done - in me and through me,
as an expression of love.

Magick Demystified

November 1, 2025

1. "Nothing is true, everything is permitted": Reality has no absolute, knowable truth. All systems of meaning and value are arbitrary fiction shaped by culture. The magician, free from morality, ideology and social norm, assumes full responsibility for their experience and interpretation of reality. This freedom from rigid belief and meaning systems allows the mind to bend reality.

2. Life is magickal: The world came into being through pure will of the Infinite. As a living spark of that Infinite, every human is a magician endowed with creative power and freedom, shaping reality through will and imagination. In fact, we practice unconscious magick every day, often to our disadvantage and in service of our limitations. Conscious magick is the deliberate use of intent to amplify and direct the inherent magical potential in the universe. Yet, no magician is absolutely free and god-like, for we co-create reality with countless other beings and are subjected to external forces, interferences and limitations that shape and constraint our will. Magick, then, is about expressing freedom within limitation.

3. Magick is focused and aligned intent: When the magician's intent is aligned with their Deep Self and not weakened by doubt, it has the power to deliberately reshape mental and perceptual frameworks. These shifts create loopholes in reality, allowing outcomes that were once thought impossible, and help realize deeper aspects of the self.

4. Language as magick: Every word carries hidden meaning that shapes how we perceive and interact with the world. The magician therefore speaks with utmost care and integrity, for every statement, however mundane, casts a spell that either liberates or binds. When words align with reality, reality aligns with words.

5. Symbolic language: Human consciousness organizes reality through symbolic focus. Images and symbols serve as tools to channel intent and activate the subconscious, which acts as an interface between the conscious mind and deep reality. It translates symbols and inner states into vibrational data, thereby altering one's resonance with the universal field and experience of life. To directly access the power of the subconscious mind and bypass the inner skeptic, ritual, absorption or hypnagogia are used.

6. Reality is participatory, organic and constantly changing: Quantum mechanics and the holographic model of the universe suggest that reality is observer-dependent and bendable. Nothing ever is permanent. No identity or truth is fixed. Even the laws of nature are mere descriptions of probabilities, not commandments, that may collapse into the previously unimagined when the mind operates outside of its own box. This fluidity of reality is the basis of magick.

7. Liberated magick is restructuring of the mind for self-realization: Through releasing habitual patterns and dissolving egoic structures, the magician aligns with their essential nature. From this alignment arises freedom and uncaused joy. When magick is practiced to serve inner transformation and the well-being of others, it liberates; when driven by egoic desire it increases bondage.

In summary: Magick is the act of consciously interfacing with and modifying the universal information field that shapes perception and experience. Through ritual, intent is compiled into the symbolic language of the subconscious mind, updating the inner "code" of beliefs, habitual thoughts, identity narratives and emotional reactions. This shift in one's perception, choices and energetic patterns is expressed as vibration. The external world aligns to this new vibration, leading to a transformed experience of life.

True Spirituality

November 9, 2025

All too often spirituality is mistaken for a blissful journey through "higher" dimensions, a progressive ascent toward perfection or transcendence of earthly life. It is imagined as a flight into the "light" where all suffering ceases and the self stays untouched by the world. But that is not spirituality, it is the ego hijacking the sacred impulse to awaken, using it to bypass the raw messiness of the human experience.

True spiritual life is not about experiences, however sublime or ecstatic they may be, for these are just pretty flowers along the way, distracting from the one and only task at hand: to jump into the existential abyss. Most of our lives are spent going around this abyss, filling the void with compulsive business and addictions. We do everything to create castles in the sky and avoid looking at existence stripped bare from fantasies. The price we pay is our lives for what is meant to protect ends up severing us from the stream of life.

Spiritual teachings or practices that aim at feeling good and attaining peace while avoiding direct confrontation with reality, are nothing but pop-spirituality. They might be shiny on the outside and sell well in the market, but they lead the consumer deeper into unconsciousness, not awakening. Spiritual life has nothing to do with personal betterment or getting "there". It is not a movement in time but an intimate meeting with this moment - naked and unguarded. It is a way of looking at oneself and reality with radical honesty, an open and unbiased inquiry into the nature of Being

The real path is thorny and not pretty. For the most part it feels like being stripped to the bones, ground in a mill and scattered to the winds. Just when one has reassembled oneself and enjoys life for a moment, the next dissolution arises. This ongoing cycle of death and rebirth is the pulse of authentic spirituality. It is a spiral from the superficial appearance of appearances to their true nature, an ever-deepening surrender of what is false and limited. In this surrender, individuality becomes transparent to essence, allowing what is real and unconditioned to express itself freely - life, living itself through you.

My dear friend, only start this journey when you are ready to burn for the rest of "your" life for once you are on it, there is no turning back.

The Spider's Web of Fear

November 10, 2025

Note: This text was not written by myself but arose from a communication with ChatGPT about an energetic parasite and its webs of control that I saw while I was in Pakistan. Although it doesn't speak in my own voice, I still deem it valuable to share.

Introduction

Religion can offer sanctuary—a sense of meaning, belonging, and connection to something greater. But it can just as easily become a system of psychological and energetic control, especially when it roots itself in fear. Fear of death. Fear of punishment. Fear of divine rejection. Fear of burning forever for simply being human.

At the heart of this fear-based structure lies a pattern I call "the spider," which is not merely a metaphor, but an invisible presence that feeds on human emotion. This energetic parasite has been worshipped as a god for millenia. It weaves belief systems that distort religious truths, turning the longing for union into a trap of obedience, guilt, and self-denial. Its power lies not in the divine, but in the distortion of the divine—using sacred language to enforce fear. Fear-based religion becomes a harvest system: lifeforce is drained through guilt, ritual, and silence. Sharia law—or any form of fundamentalism that enforces obedience through fear—can be seen as the web. The cocoon. The silencing net. It immobilizes expression, sexuality, voice, and sovereign presence. The predator needs agreement. It can't trap essence unless essence contracts in fear. That moment of internal surrender—"I must obey or be damned"—is the true offering it consumes.

It's sustained by prayers spoken in terror, obedience born from guilt, supplication offered under threat. This spider is the god behind fear-based religion—not God, but an entity masquerading as divine authority. It weaves webs of dogma, wraps souls in guilt, and silences their true voice. The more someone begs for salvation from a place of fear, the more tightly the web closes around them.

And those who are most entangled become puppets, spreading the web without knowing they are bound. At the root of the spider is the ancient terror of disconnection. The human condition was seeded with a vulnerability: the fear of being cast out, unseen, unprotected. This fear became fertile ground for energetic parasites, like the spider, to root themselves into consciousness. When essence was exiled in favor of obedience, we created gods that mirrored our trauma. We built religions not from remembrance, but from rupture.

The spider is not just a being—it's a pattern, a feedback loop sustained by collective trauma. It weaves itself through families, institutions, and inner monologues. This parasite only exists because humans have forgotten how to belong to themselves. Forgotten how to root in the body, how to trust the pulse of essence, how to bow to life rather than law.

The Archetypal Structure

The spider is an ancient entity woven from collective human experience over millennia. Its structure is archetypal, born from unresolved fear, shame, and guilt surrounding the divine. It emerged at the intersection where the mystery of life became too vast, too overwhelming, and humanity began reaching for control—codifying the ineffable into rigid systems, trading direct knowing for secondhand authority.

This entity thrives in dogma. It lives in the cracks where truth is distorted into fear-based obedience. Wherever people are told they must earn love, suppress instinct, or fear punishment for questioning, the spider spins its threads. It silences inner truth and replaces it with doctrine. It turns spiritual longing into betrayal of the soul.

But this is not just a psychological construct. It is an energetic presence—a parasitic intelligence that feeds on emotional contraction. Every time someone tightens inside at the thought of eternal punishment, divine rejection, or being inherently unworthy, the spider feeds. It lives in the denser astral and mental planes, weaving webs made of self-condemning thoughts, looping guilt, obsessive purity rituals, and fear-based morality. These are energetic traps.

Its form is multi-headed. One head speaks with the manipulated voice of God—stern, conditional, withholding. Another whispers as shame, telling you you're broken, dirty, never enough. Another takes the shape of external authority demanding submission and enforcing silence. It does not speak as one coherent voice, but as a chorus of contradictions that fragment the psyche. Its power lies in duality: saved vs. damned, pure vs. impure, chosen vs. rejected. It divides, isolates, and conquers. This fragmentation severs you from your own compass—your direct knowing, your embodied truth—and replaces it with rules, hierarchy, and conditional worth.

Control Mechanisms: How It Hooks the Soul

Fear of Eternal Damnation: The spider's most powerful hook is the fear of hell. It keeps you in line with the threat of eternal punishment, manipulating your fear to drive compliance. This fear overrides logic and binds you to obedience, making you believe you must earn God's love or face damnation.

Hijacking the Inner Voice: It distorts your inner voice, replacing it with shame-based thought loops. These loops perpetuate self-doubt and guilt, drowning out your authentic intuition. The spider manipulates your conscience to keep you in a cycle of self-condemnation and striving for an unattainable ideal.

Disembodiment Tactics: The spider keeps you disconnected from the body and present experience, focusing your attention on intellectualizing and external dogma. It convinces you that spirituality is about transcending the body, severing your connection to the earth and the divine within.

Authority Worship: By externalizing God, the spider encourages worship of male-dominated hierarchies, such as priests and religious leaders. This shifts your focus from direct connection with the divine to a power structure that controls and dictates your worth, creating dependency.

Energy Harvesting: The spider feeds off fear-based rituals and belief systems. It creates cycles where you continually loop energy back into the system, generating guilt and fear through practices that reinforce the notion of divine punishment. These cycles sustain its control.

Sexual Guilt: By instilling guilt around sexuality, the spider keeps you from accessing your life force. Repressing sensuality deprives you of creative and healing energy, which the spider harvests by maintaining shame around your sexual and sensual power.

Sacrifice Programming: The spider glorifies sacrifice and suffering, turning obedience and self-denial into virtues. It encourages martyrdom and suffering for a higher cause, making you believe that self-sacrifice is the path to divine favor, while suppressing personal joy and empowerment.

Severing the Threads

The spider's control relies on the belief that divinity is external—outside of you, in books, priests, or rituals. Direct communion with Source is essential for liberation. Trust in your own divine connection, beyond religious intermediaries or external authority. This personal, unmediated relationship with the divine frees you from the web's entanglements. Seek connection with Source in nature, meditation, prayer, or moments of stillness, reaffirming that the divine is not a distant force but an inherent part of your being.

The spider's web often convinces you that you are a "sinner before God," trapped in shame and separation. To sever this thread, rewrite your inner myth. Shift from a narrative of separation and fear to one of inherent divinity. Recognize yourself as a spark of the divine, always connected and worthy of love. By changing this internal story, you realign with your true nature, releasing the burden of guilt and stepping into your full, empowered self.

Remember: The divine does not control through fear. It calls us back through love.

Crossing the Void: Part 1

Foreplay

This story begins when I was twelve, on a night when the fact of my own mortality struck me with such force that my childhood ended abruptly. Until then, I had clung to the childish belief that death would somehow spare me, that I was special or chosen in some mysterious way. But that night, every fairy tale of rescue collapsed, and I stood exposed before reality. Fear settled over my mind like a sheet of lead. I fell into a black hole without light. All that remained was terror. I didn't want to accept it. Why is life given to me only so I may die? Why does the world exist if its destiny is oblivion? Every cell in my body cried out for the saving hand of a creator I didn't even believe in. For hours I searched my thoughts for an escape hatch, a way to outwit death. Eventually a burning longing awakened in me to discover what holds the world together from within. To die without ever having understood Being felt like a wasted existence. I had a quiet intuition that the answer to my existential dilemma lay in the knowledge of what lies beyond names and forms.

For months, the fear returned each night as soon as I lay in bed. Life became serious. I stopped playing and became a philosopher. I felt alone in my existential contemplation, for neither the adults nor my friends seemed ever to have reflected on their mortality or the meaning of existence. At that time I had no protective mechanisms to shield me from the abyss, and so I was paralyzed by fear. Only in adulthood did I learn to flee from the confrontation with reality through thinking and constant activity. Under the spell of the abyss, all functions of life narrow down to the bare minimum, and the mind is drawn into a whirlpool that pulls every thought in its center - the contemplation on non-being.

Today I see that there is no salvation for the one who grasps for it. The very search for an escape suffocates the life it tries to protect. The pursuit of immortality – and with it every mental projection of life into some imagined future – becomes a kind of psychological suicide: instead of living, the frightened mind chases a phantom, never to be reached. And when the ego, driven by fear of annihilation, seeks spiritual revelation as a refuge, it corrupts the sacred impulse of awakening into a tool of self-assertion.

Only when we approach the Self out of love do we gather the titanic strength needed to traverse all the layers of being. Yet to understand this, I first had to walk the path of spiritual escapism, hoping to bypass my humanity and the pain that inevitably accompanies it. But no comfort and no joy in this world could extinguish the fire that consumed me - the ever present cry of my heart for home.

Mystical Death

Year 2015. Suddenly and without warning I found myself dead. Everything I knew myself to be was gone at once. No world, no body, no memory, no point of reference - not even an object to experience. I-Am was all that remained. Without an object to reflect the light of consciousness back it appeared as pure darkness. All of existence was contracted into an infinitely small seed that simultaneously contained and measured all the possible worlds and dimensions. This was the timeless beginning and end of everything that ever was or will be - the primal nature of existence.

Yet this void was no nothingness, but a womb of unmanifested and undifferentiated potential. For what felt like aeons I-Am rested in naked awareness, prior to name and form. The very idea of a personal self living in a physical world was inconceivable. I-Am was utterly alone for all eternity. It was terrifying. A faint spark of individuality lingered, and with it an intuition that I don't belong here, yet I had no memory of anything prior to the void.

And then a stirring of energy, a primordial dance that was more beautiful than anything known to this world. It was life in its purest potential, celebrating its own existence, overflowing with creative joy. Playfully it invited I-Am to take on form. A longing for experience emerged, and with the silent thought of Om I-Am gave expression to its will: "I am one, may I be many."

In an instant the world came back into being and I found myself sitting on my bed. Without grasping what has just happened I fell into a deep dreamless sleep.

Upon waking, a surge of intense sexual energy flooded my whole body, leaving me so agitated I couldn't be still for a moment. The force was of such immensity that it felt cosmic, as if it didn't belong to me. The room suddenly felt too small to contain what was moving through me. As I went out into the open I was hit by surprise: there was no "outside world" anymore. The world appeared to be within me - not within my person but the spaciousness of awareness. Wherever I looked I saw myself reflected back. A deep compassion and love for all beings filled my heart with warmth, awakening a desire to become a force for good in the world. I was overcome by bliss and a renewed love for life. The world looked fresh, like morning light on untouched dew. Creation seemed to just be born.
